Being a one-man project, it's clear to see why Chris Cannella added and tweaked over a thousand features to Lightroom 5. There are 33 Tools in Lightroom, a time-saving feature nobody else could have come up with. If you know where to find the tools, they are all there! If you are a creative pro, you will use the tools for 90% of your projects. Don't get me wrong, the Interface and workflow are as good as it gets. The non-professional will be able to get up to speed in no time at all and more importantly know where to look if they need it. The interface is as good as it needs to be. Do you really need all the sliders, a task switcher, an Info panel, a fx button, and yet another splash screen? They're there because they are convenient, and they do the job. The one really cool feature I experienced was that it succeeds by matching your camera metering and white balance, not the CMYK profile in your print and project files, which is a great feature! You will never need to deal with the details of sharpening profiles and such. That's because the assumption is you have a digital camera that meters and has a default white balance that you can ignore. It's just a guess, of course, as to whether or not that's applicable to your camera. Now, Adobe is also trying to get more people into RAW photography. They're trying to make the jump straight from the RAW file. From a purely photo point of view, it's a better approach, but I have my doubts about it. I know you want to take great photos, so you will make the lifestyle changes to get the best results. It's great that Lightroom supports a wider array of cameras than ever before, and that also includes your phone. Any smartphone with a flash can be used with a small adapter for professional images.
